THE FAMILY TV BASEBALL HANDBOOK

The editor's assignment was to get dad, the Little Leaguer and even mom into the starting lineup. In other words, make this a booklet with something in it for every member of the family.

For the younger set there are baseball tips by PeeWee Reese, the NBC-TV "Major League Baseball" announcer who was one of the great shortstops of all time with the Brooklyn Dodgers.

In the Family Quiz, mom and perhaps sister too will find challenging questions especially for them. What's a Baltimore chop?

It doesn't matter for whom you root. There are schedules, histories and rosters of all 20 major league teams, with vital statistics including uniform numbers and lifetime player records.

Figger filberts, that vast legion of fans who live by the book, will find a treasury of facts on the World Series Records page, ideal for settling debates when the Series rolls around in October.

The Elias Sports Bureau, baseball statisticians, has verified the information in THE FAMILY TV BASEBALL HANDBOOK, published exclusively for Phillips 66, sponsor of "Major League Baseball."

Their recent success belies the fact the Cardinals were perennial doormats of the National League in their early years. They improved with the arrival of Rogers Hornsby, who won six straight batting titles and hit .424 in 1924, a modern record.

Ironically, it was 1926, the year after his sixth title, that Hornsby made his greatest contribution to the Cardinals. As player-manager he led them to their first pennant. They won eight more in the next 20 years without Hornsby. Personal differences led to his dismissal in 1927.

The Cards' 1934 champs gained fame as "the Gas House Gang" for their rough and tumble play. Frank Frisch was manager. His most fiery disciples were Pepper Martin, Ducky Medwick, Leo Durocher and zany Dizzy Dean, the last pitcher to win 30.

Age and Dean's sore arm broke up the gang and the Cardinals slipped, were rebuilt and won three consecutive pennants in the 1940s with a team that matched the Gas House Gang's excitement and daring. For example, Enos Slaughter scored from first on a single to win the 1946 World Series. Star of the team was a young man named Stan Musial, who became the greatest batsman in NL history. He won seven batting titles and when he retired Stan was the all-time league leader in games played, at-bats, runs, hits, runs-batted-in, doubles and total bases.

With Musial gone, the Cardinals no longer dominated the league, but they pulled two surprises to win pennants No. 10 and 11 in 1964 and 1967. Bob Gibson tied a record by pitching five consecutive complete-game victories as the Cardinals won their seventh and eighth World Series.

PeeWee's TIP Pitchers: Keep eyes on target until ball is in catcher's glove or hits bat.

MANAGER—Herman Franks (3). COACHES—Charlie Fox (9), Larry Jansen (46), Peanuts Lowrey (6), Wes Westrum (38).

Note: S in B-T (bats-throws) column means switch-hitter.

Not even the oldest old-timer, proud of the tradition and success of his Giants, would deny that the greatest Giant player of them all still wears their uniform.

It seems like yesterday that Willie Mays came up and, after 12 hitless at-bats, hit a home run, his first of 564 (through 1967). Only Babe Ruth hit more. Mays has won a batting title, hit 52 homers and led the Giants to two pennants, one each in New York and San Francisco, since his rookie year, 1951...and what a year that was!

In August the Giants trailed the Dodgers by 13½ games, but Mays and pitchers Sal Maglie and Larry Jansen gave them the impetus to catch up and win the pennant on Bobby Thomson's celebrated sudden-death home run in the third playoff game.

Since 1900 the Giants have won 16 pennants, more than any other NL team. Even Mays must take a back seat to the Little Napoleon, John McGraw, as Mr. Giant. McGraw arrived in 1902 and turned the Giants into winners with players like Roger Bresnahan, Joe McGinnity and Christy Mathewson, who tied Grover Cleveland Alexander for most victories in the National League, 373.

Later McGraw made four great acquisitions—Frank Frisch, Carl Hubbell, Bill Terry and Mel Ott. Hubbell won 253 games; Ott arrived in New York at 16 and stayed to hit 511 home runs; Terry was the National League's last .400 hitter in 1930 and succeeded McGraw to win three pennants.

An era ended when the Giants moved to San Francisco in 1958. The new stars are strange to old-timers — Juan Marichal, Jim Hart, Willie McCovey—but Willie Mays remains as the last link to a glorious past.

PeeWee's TIP Select a bat that is not too heavy to handle and take a comfortable stance.

The Braves' story is a tale of three cities and the dickens of a time they had getting in and out of two of them.

Their greatest success came in the Braves' second home, Milwaukee, although those 13 years represent less than one-seventh of their existence.

In Milwaukee the Braves won two consecutive pennants (1957-58) for the first time since the 1890s and enjoyed great financial success. In 1952, their last season in Boston, attendance hit a low of 281,278. The following year they drew nine times that many in Milwaukee and attracted more than two million fans in each of the next four seasons.

In 1954 the Braves were joined by rookie outfielder Hank Aaron, who this year will pass all the team's offensive records. Aaron and Ed Mathews hit 935 home runs for the Braves in 13 years. No two teammates ever hit more, not even the Yankees' Babe Ruth and Lou Gehrig.

Aaron and Mathews and Warren Spahn, whose 363 victories are a record for a left-handed pitcher, led a team that finished first or second for six straight seasons from 1955 through 1960.

In Boston the Braves had little to cheer about. They beat Philadelphia in the National League's first game in 1876 and their greatest success came before 1900.

After that they won two pennants, the first in 1914 when they were the "Miracle Braves." Last on July 4, Boston won the pennant by 10½ games. They didn't win again until 1948, just before dwindling attendance forced the move to Milwaukee, baseball's first franchise shift in 51 years. The Braves became the first team to move twice, going to Atlanta in 1966.

In a sense it all started in Cincinnati, which had baseball's first professional team in 1869. With a total payroll of $9,500, the team played 130 games over two years before losing.

Cincinnati also was first to have ladies' day, to option a player, to travel by air, to play night ball and to appear in a TV game (at Brooklyn, August 26, 1939).

Prompted by their success, others formed pro teams and raided Cincinnati's players. It took the Reds until 1919 to win another National League pennant. They did not win again until 1939 and 1940.

Those Reds were powerhouses, managed by Bill McKechnie and including Frank McCormick, Ival Goodman, Ernie Lombardi, Bucky Walters, Paul Derringer and Johnny Vander Meer, the only man to pitch no-hitters in two successive games. In 1947 another Red, Ewell Blackwell, almost matched it, going to the ninth before losing what would have been his second straight no-hit game. In 1965 another Red, Jim Maloney, pitched two no-hitters, but he lost the first one when he gave up two hits to the Mets in the eleventh inning.

Early Red heroes were Edd Roush, Eppa Rixey, Heinie Groh, Bubbles Hargrave and Noodles Hahn. In recent years came Ted Kluszewski, who smacked 49 homers in 1954, and Frank Robinson, who led the Reds to their fourth modern pennant in 1961. He was the all-time Red leader in homers, runs and total bases when traded to Baltimore in 1966.

They started as Red Stockings, then became Reds. During the Korean War, anti-Communist groups suggested the name be changed to Redlegs. "Let the Russians change," said a Cincinnati reporter, "we had the name first."

When Houston joined the National League in 1962 with 23 players costing $1,850,000, the owners were determined the team would be the Houston Colt 45s—guns, not horses. Everyone called them the Houston Colts—horses, not guns. After two years, the owners gave in and a new page was written in Houston's brief baseball history.

In 1964, they were the Houston Astros, more modern, more closely associated with the city of astronauts. They also had a new home, the plush Astrodome, baseball's only domed stadium, built for $31.6 million.

From the start Houston gained an edge on the New York Mets, its expansionist partner. While the Mets felt they needed famous names, the Astros (Colts) chose younger players with an eye to the future. It paid off immediately—Houston was 8th, the Mets 10th—and every year thereafter; Houston has never finished below New York.

The Astros have had three managers, beginning with Harry Craft for the first two and a half years. He was replaced in 1964 by Luman Harris, who was succeeded by Grady Hatton in 1966.

The Astros have had their moments, including three no-hitters: Don Nottebart in 1963; Ken Johnson, the first pitcher to lose a nine-inning no-hitter, in 1964; rookie Don Wilson in 1967. Jim Wynn set Houston records with 37 home runs, 107 runs-batted-in, to rank among the league leaders in 1967.

The Astros have made considerable progress and have a bright future with youngsters like pitcher Larry Dierker and outfielder Rusty Staub. By 1967, only third baseman Bob Aspromonte remained of the 23 original Colts—guns, not horses.

The Mets were conceived in 1958 when the Dodgers moved from Brooklyn to California. When the Giants tagged along, New York was without National League baseball.

Lawyer Bill Shea was named head of a committee to bring a team to New York. In 1962, the NL expanded and the desired result was achieved. The team was named Mets, an abbreviation of Metropolitans of the American Association in the 1890s.

The first 22 Mets came from rosters of established teams for $1.8 million. The team tried to be all things to all New York baseball fans. They selected the former New York Yankee leader—the legendary Casey Stengel—as manager; they played in the Giants' crumbling, old park—the Polo Grounds; and they loaded their roster with former Dodger favorites—Gil Hodges, Roger Craig, Don Zimmer and Charlie Neal.

In 1964 the Mets moved to a new home in Flushing, $25 million Shea Stadium (after Bill Shea). By then, they were the Amazing Mets, a nickname born out of frustration and sarcasm. Amazing they were. In six years they escaped last place every year except five. But failure bred success and they drew more than one million fans every year since 1963.

Stengel retired at age 75 in 1965 and was replaced by Wes Westrum, who led the Mets to ninth place in 1966. But they were back in 10th in 1967 and then Gil Hodges, an original Met, became manager.

In 1962 the Mets had their first .300 hitter, Richie Ashburn. In 1964 they had their first all-star, Ron Hunt. In 1967 they had their first Rookie of the Year, Tom Seaver. But the Mets' best teams and biggest stars are yet to come...they hope.

No fan has been as long-suffering as the Phillie fan. Old-timers remember 14 consecutive years in the second division, 1918 to 1931. Those approaching middle age remember 16 straight years in the second division, 1933 to 1948. Youngsters remember four straight cellar teams, 1958 to 1961, and a modern record of 23 straight losses. The Phillies have finished last 22 times, more than any other major league team.

But old, middle-aged or young, the Phillie fan has had his moments. Old-timers remember their first pennant in 1915 and the pitcher who won 31 games, Grover Cleveland Alexander. In seven seasons he won 190 games as a Phillie and his career 373 victories ties him with Christy Mathewson for the National League record.

In the late 20s and 30s the team escaped the second division once despite Chuck Klein, who set their home run record of 43 and runs-batted-in record of 170.

The Phillies waited 35 years for their second pennant, winning in 1950 with the "Whiz Kids," so called because of their youth. Del Ennis hit 31 homers and Richie Ashburn batted over .300. Jim Konstanty appeared 74 times in relief and youngsters Robin Roberts and Curt Simmons combined for 37 victories. Roberts, the first successful bonus player, won 20 or more games for six straight seasons.

Then the team sank, but bounced back. In 1964 they reached a low point by blowing a 10-game lead in the final weeks, but hit a high note when Jim Bunning pitched the NL's first perfect game in 84 years. They also added a new slugger, Richie Allen, who slammed 40 homers in 1966 and gives the Phillies hope for the future.

No matter where they move, the Dodgers will never leave Brooklyn. The mark is indelible. Things happened in Brooklyn: Babe Herman going into third although the base was occupied; Casey Stengel tipping his cap and a bird flying out; Mickey Owen dropping a third strike that probably cost the 1941 World Series; the Dodgers blowing a 13½-game lead in August; pitcher Billy Loes losing a ground ball in the sun.

The National League has had four playoffs and the Dodgers were in all, losing three and promising "Wait 'til next year."

"Are the Dodgers still in the league?" asked Bill Terry, manager of the hated Giants, in 1934. The Dodgers answered by knocking the Giants out of first place on the last two days of the season.

Early days were filled with comedy and failure, although the Dodgers won pennants in 1900, 1916, 1920 and 1941 and had such outstanding players as Zack Wheat, Jake Daubert, Dazzy Vance, Dolph Camilli and the "Peepul's Cherce," Dixie Walker.

But the team's greatest success came after World War II under Branch Rickey, who signed Jackie Robinson, the first Negro in organized baseball. From 1946 to 1966, the Dodgers won 10 pennants. In the 1950s they were the hottest team in the league at the gate and on the field with such stars as Robinson, PeeWee Reese, Gil Hodges, Duke Snider, Roy Campanella, Carl Furillo, Don Newcombe and Preacher Roe.

In 1958 they moved to Los Angeles, but could not escape Brooklyn. They won pennants in 1959, 1963, 1965 and 1966 led by the greatest pitcher of his era, Sandy Koufax, who pitched four no-hitters. He was born in Brooklyn.

MANAGER—Leo Durocher (2). COACHES—Joe Amalfitano (5), Joe Becker (3), Pete Reiser (7), Verlon Walker (4).

Note: S in B-T (bats-throws) column means switch-hitter.

Chicago's Cubs had 19 straight years in the second division when Leo Durocher became manager in 1966 and they finished 10th. But Leo the Lip barked a warning—it was a rebuilding year. True to his word he was an amazing third in 1967 and with young stars Ron Santo, Billy Williams and Ken Holtzman, Cub fans believe a return to the glory days is near.

What days of glory the Cubs had! Al Spalding pitched and managed them to the National League's first championship in 1876; Cap Anson managed three straight winners in the 1880s; Frank Chance won in 1906 with a record 116 victories and again in 1907, 1908 and 1910; Joe McCarthy won in 1929 and thereafter the Cubs won a pennant every three years through 1938.

The Cubs won again in 1945. Since then all of Wrigley's gum could not buy another championship and the only team in baseball without lights stayed in the dark.

The Cubs have had heroes: Larry Corcoran, who pitched three no-hitters; Roscoe Barnes, first NL batting champ; Charlie Root, who served up Babe Ruth's "called shot"; Hippo Vaughn, loser in the double no-hitter in 1917; Hack Wilson, who set a league home run record with 56 and a major league runs-batted-in record with 190 in 1930; Gabby Hartnett, whose dramatic home run in darkness won the 1938 pennant; Three Finger Brown, Phil Cavarretta, Heinie Zimmerman, Ernie Banks.

But of all, the most famous Cubs are three who made up baseball's legendary double-play combination and were immortalized in Franklin P. Adams' verse:

"These are the saddest of possible words,
Tinker to Evers to Chance."

Note: S in B-T (bats-throws) column means switch-hitter.

Pirate fans of the futile fifties may find it hard to believe their heroes had won three National League pennants by the time the 20th century was four years old.

In 1899, the NL dropped four teams, including Louisville, whose owner, Barney Dreyfuss, bought a half interest in the Pirates and brought his best players with him. Among them was Honus Wagner, the game's greatest shortstop. The Pirates jumped from seventh to second in 1900 and won the pennant the next three years.

Wagner won eight batting championships. After he left, the Pirates did not win again until 1925 with Pie Traynor, the peerless third baseman.

In 1927 two brothers led them to another flag. Paul (Big Poison) Waner won his first of three batting titles with .380 and rookie Lloyd (Little Poison) Waner hit .355. Between them they had 460 hits.

After World War II the Pirates finished seventh or eighth eight straight years. Only Ralph Kiner kept fans coming to Forbes Field, hitting more than 40 homers for five straight years—including 54 in 1949—and finished with 301 as a Pirate.

By 1955 things began to happen. Bob Friend was in his fifth year with the club; Vern Law and Dick Groat were just out of service; Elroy Face was up from New Orleans; Bill Mazeroski was a year away in Hollywood; and Roberto Clemente was drafted from the Dodgers. These six helped the Pirates to their seventh pennant in 1960. They have remained contenders ever since, thanks to Clemente, who won his first batting title in 1961. He won again in 1964, 1965 and in 1967 with .357, highest in the NL since Stan Musial's .376 in 1948.

When the Boston Red Sox went from ninth in 1966 to first in 1967 it was the greatest turnabout in baseball history, a tribute to patience and perseverance. The Sox had many heroes: rookie manager Dick Williams, ace pitcher Jim Lonborg, triple crown winner and Most Valuable Player Carl Yastrzemski, and Tom Yawkey, their long-suffering owner.

Yawkey, millionaire industrialist, bought the club in 1932 and until the great comeback of '67, the Sox won only one pennant, in 1946, but not for lack of trying. He spent a fortune trying to undo the harm that was done before he arrived.

At one time the Sox dominated the American League. In 1903 they won the pennant and the first World Series ever played. From 1912 to 1918, they won four pennants. The club was owned by theatrical producer Harry Frazee. Needing money, he sold off Boston stars, including Babe Ruth to the Yankees in 1920.

Ruth had set a World Series pitching record of 29⅔ consecutive scoreless innings, then switched to the outfield to belt an incredible 29 home runs in 1919.

After Ruth left, the Red Sox finished in the second division 15 straight years, while the Yankees won seven pennants.

Yawkey vowed to build a winner. He bought Lefty Grove, Joe Cronin and Jimmy Foxx, who hit 50 homers in 1938, and developed stars Bobby Doerr, Dom DiMaggio and Ted Williams, the last .400 hitter (.406 in 1941). Later came Yastrzemski, Lonborg, George Scott and Tony Conigliaro.

The Sox were always near the top, but 1946 was their only championship until the comeback miracle of 1967.

Note: S in B-T (bats-throws) column means switch-hitter.

Some of the game's greatest hitters have worn the uniform of the Detroit Tigers. From the incomparable Georgia Peach, Ty Cobb, to current hero, Al Kaline, the Tigers have had 22 batting champions, more than any other team.

Not much happened in Detroit baseball BC (before Cobb). When he arrived in August, 1905, the Tigers became a team.

In 1907 Cobb won his first batting title and the Tigers won their first of three consecutive pennants, the first American League team to do so.

Cobb went on to win 12 batting titles, nine of them in succession. Both feats are records. So is his .367 lifetime average, three .400 seasons, 23 .300 seasons, 3,033 games, 11,429 at-bats, 2,244 runs, 4,191 hits and 892 stolen bases.

From 1921 to 1927 the Tigers had five batting champions (Harry Heilmann four, Heinie Manush one), but they did not win another pennant until 1934 and 1935, teams managed by Mickey Cochrane and led at bat by Charlie Gehringer and Hank Greenberg, who was to clout 58 home runs in 1938.

The Tigers can boast that George Kell (1949) is the only third baseman to win a batting title; that Kaline was the youngest batting champion (20) in 1955; that Sam Crawford hit more triples than any other player (312); and that only once (1952) did they finish last.

Detroit won again in 1940 when Greenberg hit 41 homers and won his second Most Valuable Player trophy, and in 1945, when Hal Newhouser won 25 games.

But they have not won since and the pity is that Kaline, a .300 hitter for 15 seasons, has never played in a World Series.

From White Sox to Black Sox to Go Sox—that's the history of Chicago's entry in the American League, which debuted in Chicago on April 24, 1901, with the White Stockings defeating Cleveland, 8-2. Chicago also was the league's first champion.

Chicago's second AL pennant came in 1906 with the "hitless wonders," so called because its team batting average was .228.

For the next 10 years the Sox declined. They rebuilt to win in 1917 with a young team that had the makings of a dynasty. Interrupted in 1918 by World War I, the Sox picked up with a pennant in 1919.

The heavily-favored Sox lost to Cincinnati in a World Series clouded with suspicion. In 1920 it came out. Eight Chicago players had conspired to throw the Series.

Public trust in baseball hit an all-time low, but Commissioner Kenesaw Mountain Landis, a former judge, restored the game's respect. He banned the eight culprits for life and the incident became known as the Black Sox Scandal.

It took years for the Sox to rebuild. It wasn't until 1936 that they got out of the second division with the help of two players, Luke Appling and Ted Lyons.

After finishing second or third for seven straight years, the Sox won their fifth pennant in 1959, with a team called the "Go Sox" because of its speed and dash on the bases. Luis Aparicio's 56 stolen bases tied a club record and Nellie Fox won the league's Most Valuable Player award.

In recent years pitching and speed have kept the Sox near the top. They have finished in the first division the last 17 seasons. No other team can make that statement.

After spending most of their life in Philadelphia, the Athletics moved westward in 1955, some time after Horace Greeley suggested the idea. They went to Kansas City, then to Oakland in 1968. Many think this has gone far enough.

The glory that was Philadelphia was gone in Kansas City, where they spent 13 years in the second division and had a large ownership turnover, the latest being flamboyant Charles O. Finley. In 18 years, they have had 12 managers. Before that, they were a model of stability.

The legacy of the Athletics began in 1901 when Connie Mack (Cornelius McGillicuddy) became manager of the Philadelphia team in the new American League.

Mack was Mr. Baseball. He managed for 50 years and built three powerhouses. Operating like a Wall Street speculator, he built championships, then sold his stars for large sums and built again.

He won pennants in 1902 and 1905 with pitchers Rube Waddell, Eddie Plank and Chief Bender.

From 1910 to 1914, the Athletics won four titles led by the famed $100,000 infield of Stuffy McInnis, Eddie Collins, Jack Barry and Home Run Baker, so named because he led the league in homers four straight years, with a high of 12 in 1914.

Mack won in 1929, 1930, 1931 with Al Simmons, Jimmy Foxx, Lefty Grove, George Earnshaw and Rube Walberg. Outfielder Walter French said, "When God made Connie Mack, that's all he did that day."

Mack managed his last team in 1950 at age 88. He died six years later, having seen his beloved Athletics leave Philadelphia.

Major league baseball came to the great northwest in 1961 when Calvin Griffith made like Lewis & Clark and took his team to the land of Paul Bunyan. The Minnesota Twins are, in reality, the old Washington Senators with a face-lifting.

Griffith had suffered through 14 consecutive years in the second division before moving to Minnesota with a promising, young team. After finishing seventh in 1961, a season in which Sam Mele replaced Cookie Lavagetto as manager in mid-year, the Twins began to realize their potential. In the next six years they finished lower than third only once, highlighting the period by winning their first American League pennant in 1965. They lost the World Series to the Dodgers in seven games.

The championship team was led by Zoilo Versalles, the league's Most Valuable Player; 21-game winner Jim (Mudcat) Grant; and Harmon Killebrew, who has hit 369 home runs in his last nine seasons.

When the Twins started poorly in 1967, Cal Ermer replaced Mele as manager.

Griffith comes by his baseball knowledge naturally. His uncle, Clark Griffith, was manager of the Washington club from 1912 until 1920, then was president until his death in 1955. Calvin, who started as the team's mascot in 1924 and rose through the ranks, succeeded his uncle.

Failing attendance forced Griffith to move out of Washington in 1961. He selected the name Minnesota Twins to avoid a rivalry between twin cities Minneapolis and St. Paul. Both can call the Twins their home team, although the club's executive offices and ballpark are in suburban Bloomington.

Baseball's most successful team began in 1903 when the American League shifted the Baltimore team to New York. They were the Highlanders because Joe Gordon was president and the Gordon Highlanders were a famous British regiment of the day and because they played on one of Manhattan's highest points. By 1912, they were Yankees, easier to fit in newspaper headlines.

In 1920, owner Jacob Ruppert bought Babe Ruth from the Boston club for $100,000. The first of baseball's sluggers, Ruth hit 714 home runs with a record 60 in 1927. He led the Yankees to their first of 29 pennants in 1921 and their first of 20 world championships in 1923 when the team moved from the Polo Grounds to new Yankee Stadium, "the House That Ruth Built."

In 1925 Lou Gehrig replaced Wally Pipp at first base and played 2,130 consecutive games, combining with Ruth to form the core of the famed, feared Murderers' Row.

With Ruth gone, Joe DiMaggio assumed team leadership in 1936, when the Yankees won the first of four consecutive pennants. DiMaggio, who hit safely in a record 56 straight games in 1941, was replaced in center field by Mickey Mantle, star of 12 pennant winners his first 14 years. Highlights were Don Larsen's Perfect Game in the 1956 World Series, Roger Maris' 61 homers in 1961, topping Ruth in a longer schedule, and the pitching of Whitey Ford.

The Columbia Broadcasting System bought the team for $14 million in 1966.

The Yanks have had four great managers: Miller Huggins, six pennants; Joe McCarthy, eight pennants; Casey Stengel, 10 pennants, seven world championships in 12 years; and Ralph Houk, three straight flags.

Of all the expansion teams, the Angels are by far the most successful. Starting from scratch in 1961, they have finished eighth, third, ninth, fifth, seventh, sixth and fifth in the American League.

In December, 1960, the American League voted to expand to 10 teams and awarded one of two new franchises to a Los Angeles group headed by movie cowboy Gene Autry. The following spring the Angels began competing with 28 players drafted from a special player pool for $2,150,000.

Two men are most responsible for the Angels' success on the field—general manager Fred Haney, who won pennants as manager of the Milwaukee Braves, and field manager Bill Rigney, let go by the Giants in 1960. They are the only two men the Angels have had in those two posts.

In the draft, the Angels chose young prospects rather than established major leaguers and came up with such outstanding players as Dean Chance, Jim Fregosi, Leon Wagner and Bob Rodgers. Later, youngsters Rick Reichardt, Bobby Knoop and Rickey Clark were signed as free agents.

The Angels scored a publicity coup on May 5, 1962, when a zany, much-traveled minor leaguer named Bo Belinsky pitched the team's first no-hitter against the Baltimore Orioles, the team that had let him go.

For their first five years the Angels shared Dodger Stadium in Chavez Ravine as tenants of their National League counterparts. Finally, in 1966, the Angels moved to nearby Anaheim into their own ballpark, $24 million Anaheim Stadium. They also changed their name from the Los Angeles Angels to the California Angels. Everyone agreed that it was a more stately name.

When the Washington Senators moved to Minnesota in 1961, it seemed the long history of the national pastime in the nation's capital had ended. But Washington was immediately awarded a franchise when the American League expanded, retaining the name and the lore that went with it.

Baseball first came to Washington in 1859 when government employees formed the National Athletic Club and fielded the Potomacs (also Nationals). A regular spectator was Andrew Johnson, the first President to show an interest in baseball. In 1910, President William Howard Taft began the tradition of throwing out the season's first ball in Washington's opener.

Washington had a team—the Senators—in the National League until 1900. When the American League was formed in 1901, Washington entered as a charter member.

The Senators floundered until they made two significant additions. In 1907 they signed an Idaho farmboy, Walter Johnson, "the Big Train," for a $100 bonus and $300 salary. He pitched for them for 21 seasons, winning 416 games and striking out a record 3,497 batters.

In 1912 Clark Griffith left Cincinnati to manage the Senators. He became president in 1920. In 1924 Bucky Harris, "the Boy Wonder," managed the Senators to their first pennant at age 28 and repeated in 1925. Joe Cronin won another pennant for Washington in 1933, but only four times in the next 33 years did the team rise above the second division.

An era ended in 1955 when Clark Griffith died and nephew Calvin Griffith took over. Six years later he moved, and expansion brought Washington a new team.

The Baltimore Orioles prefer to think they are descendants of the swashbuckling old Orioles who terrorized baseball in the 1890s. In fact, they are more closely related to the St. Louis Browns, who set a record for futility that may never be equalled. In 52 seasons, the Browns finished in the first division 12 times. One was their only pennant, in 1944, a war year.

The Baltimore Orioles go back, in name, to the team of fierce battlers led by John McGraw, Wilbert Robinson and Wee Willie Keeler. One umpire said they "ate gunpowder and warm blood for breakfast."

Baltimore joined the American League in 1901, but after two seasons moved to New York. The Milwaukee team became the St. Louis Browns in 1902.

Until 1926 the Browns owned St. Louis. Then their inter-city rivals, the National League Cardinals, won their first pennant. Thereafter it was all downhill for the Browns. After WW II, they finished in the second division eight straight years and attendance tumbled. Not even Bill Veeck's promotional stunts could pull the Browns out of the red.

Veeck tried in vain to move them back to Milwaukee. Then, in 1954, the team was sold to a Baltimore group and naturally became the Orioles.

The Orioles were not contenders until 1960, the year a young third baseman named Brooks Robinson reached stardom.

But the team was incomplete until 1966 when another Robinson, Frank, was acquired from Cincinnati. He won the triple crown and led Baltimore to the world championship, its first taste of glory since the days of the old Orioles 70 years earlier.

After 1946 the American League was so Yankee-dominated, if the Cleveland Indians had not won in 1948 and 1954 New York might have run 12 straight flags up the pole.

Although Cleveland pennants are rare, the Indians never lacked stars, starting with Cy Young, who won 268 of his 511 games for them. Then came Napoleon Lajoie, who was so outstanding, the team was called the "Naps" during his tenure.

Shoeless Joe Jackson came from the Athletics to hit .408 in 1911, but financial difficulty forced Cleveland to sell him to the White Sox for $15,000 in 1915.

Wealthy new owners paid Boston $55,000 for Tris Speaker, 1916 batting champion, but it was as manager that he brought Cleveland its greatest success—the 1920 flag.

Later, two youngsters sparked Cleveland. In 1936 a 17-year-old Iowa farmboy, Bob Feller, struck out 15 batters in his first start. With a blazing fast ball, he pitched three no-hitters, 12 one-hitters and won 266 games although missing four years for Navy service.

In 1942, 24-year-old Lou Boudreau became manager, but World War II interrupted the Indians' rise. After the war, Cleveland had a new owner, Bill Veeck, whose promotional genius helped draw a record 2,620,627 in 1948 as the Indians won their first pennant in 28 years.

In the years that followed, the Indians played second fiddle to the Yankees. From 1951 to 1956 they finished second every year except 1954, when they won a record 111 games to take their third pennant as Bob Feller, Bob Lemon, Early Wynn and Mike Garcia pitched 78 victories and Al Rosen, Larry Doby and Bob Avila starred at bat.
